As if I would n t have been glad enough to change them. Heaven knows, I was n t set up about having seen a ghost. Why, if only his telephoning to New York could have laid it and have averted the suffering and torment of the next two nights, I d have recanted, I d have denied myself, I d have said my name is Jones while all the time it s Smith. But, of course, I did not know what was in store for all of us, and it would n t have done any good even if I d said I was Jesse James. Believe me, I was miserable, that s all; just plain miserable, and sort of loco with it. However, I won t hold up the rest of the story telling you what a rotten night I had. The next two were to make it look like -- I was going to say thirty cents, but I guess I mean like a ten-dollar gold-piece. I do remember, though, that Annette was awfully anxious about me; and since the more I tried to explain the more anxious she grew, I just subsided. But we kept the lights going until after two. I liked the lights because while they were going I did n t have such terrible pictures of what Julia might be going through. It must have had its comical side: Annette stealing...
