Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Shadows of a Great City: A Story of a Play of That Name In the year of grace one thousand eight hundred and sixty five, Thomas Benson, banker and millionaire, of the city of New York, lay dying in the second story front room of the house which he had dwelt in for years. The house was one of those old-fashioned mansions on Broadway, which are now rapidly disappearing before the march of improvement. The progressive American character is rapidly eliminating all those landmarks of the past, so that the place that knew them once, now knows them no more, and their very existence is forgotten, save by some old inhabitant who clings with conservative fidelity to the traditions of the past, and will not admit that the glitter and regal magnificence of the present day, produced by the wild extravagance of Wall St., can ever eclipse the solid grandeur and sterling worth of those old Knickerbocker families, who held their court in Bleecker and Bond Sts. The house with which we have the most to do at present served Mr. Benson's father, as it had himself, in the double capacity of a dwelling and a place of business; and Benson's City Bank was noted far and near for its financial solidity, and the sterling integrity of its founders. The unstained commercial record of a century had not been tarnished in the hands of the poor old man who lay gasping for breath in the same chamber in which he first saw the light some seventy years before. Fortune had been lavish of her favors and had showered wealth and honors on him...
