Excerpt: . . . 11 vice modeling, nuclear materials production, radiochemistry and associated special-ized facilities, advanced computations and simulations, and the physics and chem-istry of fissile materials have been sustained in large part by leveraging off activi-ties carried out in NNSAs nuclear weapons program. In the following discussion, we address some of the details of DOE's efforts in support of technical nuclear forensics. Pre-and Post-Detonation Nuclear Device Missions NNSAs Office of Emergency Operations provides operational capabilities and sup-port in the following areas in addition to its direct support to the Attorney General in the render safe mission for interdicted nuclear devices in the United States: Develop and sustain pre-detonation nuclear device forensics concept of operations and associated capabilities. Take custody of the rendered safe nuclear explosive devices and support the collection of material samples and other forensic data from such devices. As part of the DoD-developed concept of operations for the post-detonation mis-sion, support ground sample collection after a nuclear detonation or dispersion of nuclear material within the United States. This includes providing a reliable capability to deploy, support domestic ground sample collection, and deliver post-detonation nuclear debris samples for shipment to designated laboratories. Nuclear Forensics R and D - Post-detonation analysis NNSAs Defense Nuclear Nonproliferation (DNN) organization is sponsoring ad-vanced R and D activities at our national laboratories to improve techniques for radiochemical analysis of bomb debris and has also sponsored ground-breaking work on other diagnostics tools. It is developing the next generation of post-nuclear detonation ground based forensics capabilities. Emp. . . This item ships from...
